RCA Supports the Leaders of Tomorrow

RCA recognizes the importance of developing the business leaders of tomorrow. Through our Career Development and Education Program and Annual Meeting, we provide professional development opportunities for staff at RCA member companies. With an eye towards the next generation of retail construction leaders, the RCA annually awards scholarships to top construction management students at universities throughout the United States. In addition, RCA has recently announced an initiative with the ACE Mentor Program, to provide another way for members to give back and develop future leaders on a local level.

In the 2010-2011 academic year, RCA awarded scholarships to the following students, all of whom are enrolled in qualified construction programs:

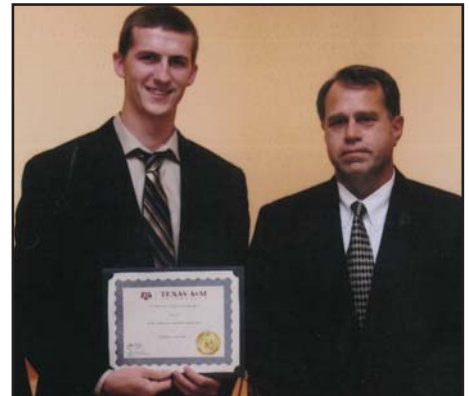

Ryan Hartney, Auburn University
Joshua D. Velazquez, Bowling Green State University
Bria Riparbelli, California State Polytechnic University (SLO)
Lillian Wyckoff, Clemson University
Brittany Lusk, Clemson University
Doug Kroeze, Ferris State University
Ryan C. Lund, Kansas State University
Lindsey S. Blum, Northern Arizona University
Kyle Boivin, University of North Florida
Kevin Leach, University of Oklahoma
Salvatore Gambino, Pratt Institute
Branden S. Burke, Purdue University
Abigail Soper, Roger Williams University
Cameron Gafford, Texas A&M University
Brett J. Hartle, University of Washington

Scholarships were also awarded at Colorado State University, Minnesota State University-Mankato, and University of Nebraska.

ACE Mentor (ACE stands for Architecture, Construction, and Engineering) has

"Thank you for your generous donation. I greatly appreciate this scholarship and it will be a huge help to me. I enjoyed talking to you following the awards ceremony. Prior to meeting you, I did not know anyone in retail construction. I hope we are able to stay in contact."

affiliates in major cities throughout the United States. The program introduces high school students to opportunities within the construction industry, with a focus on working with students from less privileged backgrounds to introduce them to the industry, and to develop the career skills needed to pursue a professional path in the construction field.

Volunteers mentor students in order to introduce them to the various professions and encourage them to pursue studies and careers in these fields. Mentors devote only the time and resources they have available and are willing to give. There is no minimum time or financial requirement,

Past Presidents: Where are They Now? Jack E. Sims

By Jennifer Danquist, Director of Business Development,
Marco Contractors, Inc.

When it comes to the RCA, we would not be here without our Past Presidents, who have guided this association, built it up, and watched it continue to grow. For this we are all grateful. In an effort to recognize these "founding fathers," remember our beginnings, and review our history, we have created a new feature in our newsletter: Past Presidents: Where Are They Now? Each edition will feature a RCA past president and give some insight into their time at the helm as well as talk about what they're doing now.

*"Education is all a matter of building bridges"
—Ralph Waldo Ellison*

Jack E. Sims was at the helm of the RCA from 1997 to 1998. At the time, he was President of PDMS Construction, Inc., one of the original RCA member companies. Sims has held several other posts since joining the RCA in 1990: he was a board member from 1992 to 1994, Secretary/Treasurer in 1995, and Vice President in 1996.

"Jack was an intense leader and a huge supporter of the RCA, as he still is today. He led by example by putting in endless hours of hard work. He was instrumental in getting the RCA involved in various trade shows and made sure our members were personally participating in panels and seminars to show the strengths of being an RCA contractor," said Barry Shames, CEO of Shames Construction Company, Ltd.

Sims started out as a tenant coordinator with Homart Development Company and built the Northbrook Court shopping mall in Chicago, IL. In talking with Sims, he shared how he has seen the industry evolve over the years.

"In 1974, my first experiences were with large, enclosed shopping malls: 100-plus retail stores under one roof, all opening on a grand opening day. I watched national retailers competing for prime locations in new malls all across the United States. In later years, the large enclosed malls transitioned into regional malls, both enclosed and open air. Again, national retailers were competing for prime locations all across the county. The next transition I saw was strip centers and free standing retail stores for the larger retailers. In more recent years it's been the transformation of existing vacant retail space. With significant empty retail space due to the economic downturn the past several years, retailers have taken advantage. The result is more remodel work, reuse of existing "parts and pieces" and minimized construction cost while still maintaining a national image. There is less new store construction and national retailers competing to purchase vacant retail stores in locations that fill out their portfolio. Retail remodeling has become a niche in recent years; a niche that retail contractors can benefit from. The days of 'run a bulldozer through it and start all over' are gone."

Having seen the industry go through so many changes throughout his career, Sims always went back to the RCA as it benefited him both personally and professionally.

"When I first started out as a RCA member, the organization provided a venue for sharing information with other individuals providing identical services to the retail community. It allowed me and my company to resolve problems without reinventing the wheel. It allowed me, a small business owner and entrepreneur, to not 'fly solo.' It was such a great resource," explained Sims.

"Personally, the RCA has given me an outlet to share and receive tons of information from my fellow peers; they were 'unofficial, unpaid' advisors. We solved many problems together and provided assistance to one another while attempting to develop a professional set of standards for retail contractors. The appreciation from assistance received and the self-satisfaction from assistance provided were significant. The network was extensive and I have been able to gain lifetime friendships with Ron Martinez, Bob Benda, Dean Olivieri, Tom Eckinger, Barry Shames, Gene Colley, Bill Winkel, and Matt Schimenti, to name a few."

Tom Eckinger, President of Eckinger Construction Company, reminisced about Sims. "I have been very fortunate to know Jack and work with him on the board of the RCA. Jack and I had many heated debates while on the board but always came to a mutually agreeable conclusion. With Jack's background in retail, construction, architecture, and as a lighting vendor, he is as knowledgeable as anyone I know in our business. Jack, along with others I have served with on the board, have been very instrumental in the path my life has taken both personally and professionally. I am very proud to call Jack my friend."

His years of experience and incredible knowledge that we've been reading about are what lead Sims and Mike Kolakowski to initially develop and author the RCA's Education and Career Development Program.

"Jack Sims truly believes in this business. He is an enormous resource for all of us and his development and care of our education program has helped our member companies grow and become better at managing retail construction," said Matthew Schimenti, President of Schimenti Construction Company, Inc. and current RCA President.

Sims has several memories and favorite things about the RCA. He continually cited the personal relationships he has formed with retail construction colleagues. He also enjoyed developing and Sims talks about the components of RCA's project management training at an Annual Meeting session.

RCA Annual Meeting

RCA's 21st Annual Meeting, "Advancing the Industry--Building Leaders," was held in March at the Gaylord Texan, prior to SPECS 2011. The three-day program featured networking and professional opportunities and was attended by almost 100 people, with half of RCA's member companies represented.

Mark Vitner, Managing Director and Senior Economist, Wells Fargo, presented for the third year in a row. This year, his economic update was more optimistic than years past. Brad Close, Vice President, Federal Public Policy, National Federation of Independent Business, discussed the possible effects of recent policies and pending legislation on retail contractors. Stephen J. Boughton, a Consultant with FMI Corporation, talked about successful business development techniques in today's market. David N. Sinodis, Senior Consultant, FMI Corporation, gave an interactive presentation on developing project managers to take on more substantial roles. All speaker presentations are available for download at retailcontractors.org (click on Events).

Tom Eckinger, Eckinger Construction Company, and RCA Past President, hosted the always popular Owner's Breakfast. This year's topic was planning for the growth, sale, turnover, or closure of a business. It is this type of discussion that really represents the benefits of RCA membership: an open exchange of ideas and advice amongst a group of peers.

Almost 100 members, retailers, and sponsors attended the Annual Meeting.

Members of the 2011-2012 RCA Board of Directors.

Two receptions were held in the Gaylord Texan's Mission Plaza.

teaching the RCA training program across the country with various member companies and retail advisory companies. The greatest memory for Sims was in 2004 when he was a guest lecturer for one week at the University of Moscow and taught an abbreviated Project Manager program. He developed this program based on his experiences with the RCA. Michael Ratner, a long-time friend of Sims that he met in the RCA, recommended him for the program and it was one of his fondest experiences!

When I asked Sims to tell me something personal, he said that he is officially retired. He sold PDMS Design and PDMS Lighting in 2006. He does have a few guilty pleasures, including golfing and snow skiing: "I'll never be as good at golf as Tom Eckinger or as good at skiing as Ron Martinez, but I always have a great time trying!"

In his free time, Sims enjoys spending time with his wife of 47 years, Jacqueline Lee Sims (she says he's well trained), his daughter Teri Lee Foster, and his son Mark Edward Sims, all who at one time or another worked at the PDMS companies. "We spend our summers in Durango, CO, at our vacation home playing mountain golf, and enjoying friends and neighbors who come to escape the Texas heat! In the winter, we travel between Arlington, TX, and Durango, to enjoy the ski slopes. I enjoy home improvement and remodel projects for friends and family in both locations. My carpenter, paint, electrical, and plumbing skills are above average... my drywall skills need work!"

If he was not in our industry, Sims said he would have been a lawyer. After college and graduate school, he developed an interest for law. He wanted to go to law school, but never had the time: retail design and construction was a full time job!

In my final moments talking with Sims, I asked if he had a mentor or hero. "I do, it's Brigadier General Robert Thompson, United States Air Force. He was my commanding officer from 1970 to 1974, when I was designing and building facilities at Ramstein Air Force Base, in Germany. I was a Captain in charge of military construction crews; the military equivalent of a project manager for a general contractor. He taught me determination and that nothing is impossible, some things just require more work than others and never settle for less. I did not realize the value of these lessons until my entry into the world of retail design and construction. He was a wise man."

As we always do at the close of these articles, we want to thank Sims for his service to the RCA Board, its members, and the commercial construction industry. In addition to everything else, his role in building RCA's powerful education program is greatly appreciated.

Next Issue: Michael H. Ratner
